

Hey Luke,

It's really fortunate for you that the link you gave to me is the only IMEI checker over the whole internet that display this IMEI as unclean. I checked before submitting the demand to remove activation lock and this morning and all the well reputable IMEI checkers report it as clean. I attach screenshots of that.

So what next?

I will take the weekend to talk to some lawyers friends of mine, to gather informations I need and to fill the form to submit a claim to the court.

Using a service that display on purpose false information is definitely something that will help.

I will let you reasonable time, let's say one week, so the 6th of august to refund the entire payments I made to you: 27,99 USD + 42USD

If you fail to refund me the full amount screenshots of that.

There is nothing to express the feelings I have for you.

Hi Nathan,As should have been explained in the email we already sent you a refund is not a problem - please send proof the device is not lost/stolen e.g. the original invoice from Apple or your carrier, either electronic or physical.

Without the requested information the supplier will not arrange a refund, and in turn we cannot refund you via card but you have been given a credit note or credit note to use against a different service on our site. These terms are clearly stated on our website prior to purchase - <https://iphoneimei.net/refund-policy>. If you have no other device to unlock at this time, perhaps friends or a family member can make use of your credit note?

When the lost/stolen service resumes in the next 7 days you will be advised.

Hi Tim,

I obtained this iPhone legally, you already have the invoice I sent you. I checked it was not lost or stolen on multiple IMEI checker before and after submitting your service request, all stated it is clean except your service...

I will open a dispute with my bank first. If I don't get a full refund I will submit a claim to the court.
